WATER MARKET DEREGULATION

At Square One we believe that preparation is the key to success. With 2017 fast approaching we are taking all steps necessary to ensure we are helping as many businesses as possible with getting prepared for the water market deregulation.

What does water market deregulation mean?

As it stands the water market currently consists of a series of regional monopolies. With more than 22 water suppliers in operation across the country this has led to non-standardised billing, dissatisfaction with customer service and high costs (money and time) in dealing with transactions.

When the market deregulates in 2017 it will open up to competition and competitive prices. This will also mean that businesses will need to negotiate prices with suppliers in the same way that gas and electric contracts are currently negotiated.

WHAT CAN WE EXPECT?

In 2008 the water market was deregulated in Scotland, this resulted in:

- More than £35million in water efficiency savings.
- A 26% increase in customer satisfaction.
- More than £30million worth of discounts made available.
- Customers saving 16 billion litres of water.

Using Scotland as a bench-mark we can expect savings, discounts, increased customer satisfaction and increased water efficiency.

When the market deregulates, using Square One will ensure you only have one point of contact for all of your gas, electricity and water needs.
